About the theme

The move towards the transformation in instructional design practices in 21st century education resulting from the advancement of information technology is critically required. It serves to enhance the quality of educational practices whilst creating an inspiring learning environment for learners, giving them an opportunity to determine their own learning activities as far as the learner-centred approach is in practice. Much effort has been spent in providing e-learning applications, tools, and strategies for the learners and teachers. However, not much effort has been done in connecting the dots, integrating elements and requirements of the current educational needs, fulfilling the nation's educational policies and aspirations into a mechanism or tool that helps teachers to have a wider perspective in the process of designing and sustaining the instructions creatively, systematically, practically and professionally. Thus, the introduction of The Collaborative Instructional Design System (CIDS) as a move towards the transformation in instructional design practices will probably provide a solution to the above issues.

In this seminar participants will have a hands-on experience of designing a lesson using CIDS application online.
